OBJECTIVES: To elucidate the immunologic roles of subsets of antigen-specific Th lymphocytes and to characterize their subpopulations. APPROACHES: Cloned Th cells specific for the major histocompatibility locus products or Ig antigens or for defined surface antigenic markers will be used as means to probe the generality of fundamental Th cell functions and interactions. To better understand the Th cell response, a variety of "reporter" genes will be employed to follow up on the possible relationships of two-dimensional gel electrophoresis between responding Th cells and target or "helper" cells. After immunization with haptens and their immunogenic conjugates, we will compare the helper cell populations in primed lymph nodes, spleens, and Peyer's patches with other populations of lymphoid cells to determine which cell type is responsible for activation of Th cells. The helper cells will be depleted by the administration of appropriate antibodies and thymectomy or irradiation before immunization, and the effects on the T cell immune response will be examined. With these procedures, we hope to identify which cells are responsible for the initiation of the Th cell immune response. We will investigate the molecules on the surface of cell types which stimulate Th cells by using "carrier" molecules that bear groups specific to any one cell type. These
